

Realizing Indigenous Rights and Responsibilities in Research (RIRRR)

Realizing Indigenous Rights and Responsibilities in Research aims to educate, inform, and promote Indigenous self-determination when engaging with researchers and research projects from outside of the community.

Topics in this module include:

- Understanding the role of colonialism as a determinant of Indigenous health
- The history of health research and Indigenous communities
- A stronger understanding of the research industry
- Frameworks that can be used to guide and govern Indigenous research in a good way
- How to exercise rights and self-determination as Indigenous peoples and communities when engaging in research

Who should take RIRRR training?

- Band administrative staff
- Band councils
- Metis governments
- Research staff
- Patient partners
- Students
- Indigenous community-based organizations
- Any individual or organization seeking to engage in Indigenous community-based research or patient-oriented research

RIRRR is currently being offered online via Zoom. Sessions are approximately four hours long. There is no cost to attend.
